

Dissolution and Reform: The City Acquires the Hospital

Having begun in 1536, the Dissolution of religious houses, including hospitals, assumed an unstoppable momentum as predatory asset strippers honed in on vulnerable institutions. Determined to save St Giles's for the city and to integrate it into a reformed system of care for the sick and poor, the rulers of Norwich moved quickly to gain royal support for their plans. The arrival of King Henry's commissioners early in 1546 was followed by a sustained campaign of political lobbying at Westminster, which is documented in unusual detail in the civic records.

Although it escaped closure, the hospital was still stripped of its contents, and, for a while, it seemed as if the chancel, with its remarkable ceiling of imperial eagles, would be demolished. Such extreme measures seemed necessary because of the heavy expenditure sustained by the mayor and corporation, which, as we can see, involved the imposition of a city-wide tax or 'relief of the poor'.
